Declaration on the use of Contributions to the Cost of Publications (CCPs) in the SciELO Network

Contributions to the Cost of Publications (CCPs) are the financial contributions that help cover the total or partial costs of publishing research in open access under CC-BY license. CCPs will replace the use of high Article Processing Charges (APCs) typically levied by commercial and society publishers.

CCPs can be used by organizations in the SciELO Network under the following conditions:

1. Articles, books, and other research communication objects funded wholly or in part by CCPs are published under strict not-for-profit modus.
2. CCP requested amounts, adjusted by currencies and optionally by author conditions, must clearly be visible in instructions to authors and on publisher websites. These amounts must also be clearly visible in submission systems for articles, books, and other research communications, along with the date of the last update and an indication of whether publishing costs have been fully or partially covered, and any exemptions that have been applied.
3. CCPs can be paid directly by authors, their organizations, research funding agencies, or other sources.
4. The organizations responsible for collecting and receiving CCPs must be clearly identified and possess the updated and transparent breakdown of the estimated average cost of articles, books, and other communication objects, which may include those related to physical and technological infrastructure, labor, expenses, indirect costs, and possibly surplus, in cases where a fund needs to be created for eventualities (see point 5). Information about this breakdown may be requested by the Advisory Committee of the respective SciELO Network collection.
5. When there is an accumulated surplus, it will be reserved for uses related to the editorial functions of articles, books, and other research communication objects.
6. Organizations adopting the use of CCPs will publicly declare their conformity with this declaration.

This declaration will be improved based on recommendations and lessons learned during the utilization of the CCP.
